First of all, I am not an engineer. Judging by its size, the shear connectors and the stiffener plate added to the lower flange it was definitely a load bearing beam that supported concrete. Other characteristics such as the holes in the bottom flange suggests the beam sat on a column or beam connections, typically used to frame openings, which suggests that it was possibly used in some type of floor framing structure. If I had to guess, I would say it was part of a main support beam that came out of a stairwell structure on an upper floor.
